Professor John (Ioannis) Darzentas is currently Leverhulme Visiting Professor in the Department of Computer Science, at the University of York, UK, during the period Jan-June 2017 and Jan-June 2018, and contributing to, among other things a project about Food Security¹.

Over the four decades of his career in academia, he has investigated many different fields beginning with Operational Research (OR). Many of the papers he published at that time were on traffic behaviour when he was at Royal Holloway College, University of London. He also made use of Computer Simulation.

In his first lectureship at Reading University, he taught Statistics and OR and carried out research on a wide range of real-world problems. In his trajectory towards tackling more complex human-centred problem spaces, he began working with Fuzzy Sets and Systems and Systems Thinking and Soft Systems, thereby acknowledging the emergence of the need to accept and to engage with the notion of multi/inter/ and even trans disciplinarity in dealing with the complexity of those situations. The power of these epistemological tools remained with him and he brought them to bear on issues to do with decision aiding and, in general, problem capturing and understanding and formulating in many different areas.

In one of his first research programmes funded by the EU, (1989) he became aware of the then fairly new field of Human Computer Interaction. This accorded well with his interests and he went on to further research and teach in this area (at the University of Athens, 1996-7; at Athens University of Economics, (1998-2001) as well at Abo Akademi University of Turku, Finland, 1997- where he was made docent-). The field, mainly populated by those with backgrounds in Computer Science or Psychology, was focusing on human centred systems that were dependent upon computers, using the tools from the relevant disciplines. However, it was, and still remains, a field open to multi- and inter- and even trans-disciplinarity.

His present research interests include Systems Thinking in Design as well as the emerging area of Service Design.

Alongside these evolving research interests, he committed himself wholeheartedly to supporting the University of the Aegean, firstly as a founding member of the Department of Mathematics, (1987) and later of the Department of Information and Communication Systems (1994) (where he also served as first Head of Department) and finally, conceiving a School of Design and establishing the Department of Product and Systems Design Engineering in 2000. This being the first Greek state funded University design department, the model followed was that of a multidisciplinary school, where students would acquire a strong theoretical grounding so that they would be able to apply their knowledge and skills to a wide variety of environments where design is called for. The curriculum ranges from 'hard' science courses to 'soft' art and design. Behind it lies the philosophy of Systems Thinking, "that the whole (Holon) is greater than the sum of the parts". This way of thinking brings a great difference to the activity of Design.
